BORDERLANDS

The upcoming issue will showcase contemporary research and differing conclusions about European borderlands, both literally and metaphorically, especially in terms of memory and identity.

Remarkable changes in the 20th and 21st-centuries associated with the transformation of borders and the creation of new ones in the European Union and beyond maintain the pace of interest in borderland studies. In the last two decades, the issue of frontiers and borderlands has become the centre of attention in not only the humanities and social sciences, but also interdisciplinary studies. Moreover, there is a new emerging sub-discipline, which ethnologists and anthropologists call 'anthropology of borderness' and sociologists term the 'sociology of borderlands'. It investigates relations between communities living at various borderlands (including national, ethnic, cultural, religious, and regional), as well as factors influencing the nature of these relations and their consequences.

As there are several periodicals entirely dedicated to Borderland research, we intend to focus on issues that are relevant to our journal. We welcome new studies in various disciplines that address this dimension, either in real time or in the course of 20th century history and memory. Contributions can deal with the following aspects (although other aspects will also be considered):

1. studies in the framework of international borders of nation states, interstate borders framing regions and other 'sub-national' political entities, as well as new global borders that bind broader formations of civilisations, economic blocs, or zones of influence and control.
2. research on the borderland subject from geographical, historical, political, religious, ethnographic, social, economic cultural and other perspectives,

3. interdisciplinary discussion of cultural borderlands and 'borderland-er' identity,
4. critical and comparative analysis of cross-border co-operation and the impact of culture on forms of co-operation,
5. examination of the collective and individual memory of of borderland region inhabitants as a phenomenon reflecting a complex relationship between memory, history and the past,
6. comparative research on diverse European borderlands, which aims to uncover common and underlying factors and their various unique constellations,
7. studies on challenges posed by contemporary social-, economic and cultural circumstances (including globalisation, migration, the EU, Schengen zone) in borderland research.
